

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Passion binds people and things together to make up a world. This book is a product of this binding, a collaborative effort of the many mentors, friends, colleagues, students, and strangers that I have been fortunate to encounter on both sides of the Pacific. My mentor Sarah Banet-Weiser was the one who seeded the germ for this project and who supported and encouraged its creative development. More than just a mentor, however, Sarah was also there when I had to juggle caring for a newborn and writing. You have left an indelible mark in my life, and I hope to channel your intellectual rigor, generosity, and care in all that I do. Other outstanding mentors—Henry Jenkins, Larry Gross, Mike Ananny—were keen readers of my work, providing the histories and leads that shaped the arguments of this book. My thinking and work would have suffered without you. Several of my chapters began in classes with Andrew Lakoff, Josh Kun, and Manuel Castells, and their advice was invaluable in improving my early drafts. My deepest gratitude to all of you for your honest feedback and the freedom to slowly work out the contours of this project.

I am also fortunate to maintain friendships with many wonderful comrades at the University of Southern California (usc). I am indebted to Tisha Dejmanee for setting up and inviting me to her writing group. She and Kelly Song, Samantha Close, Raffi Sarkissian, and Diana Lee were among the earliest to read my drafts and offer thoughts that were always kind and sharp. Several others also deserve special mention: I deeply appreciate the friendship of Zhang Lin, who continues to be someone with whom I can commiserate about life's problems. Komathi Ale-Valencia and Mina Park were also wonderful friends and meal partners who went through some of my challenging periods. Charlie and Paula Brown and Dominic Goh generously lent their homes when we needed a space and helped us with all the logistical niggles of moving from Los Angeles to Singapore. Many others have helped and touched my life in some way. I apologize for lapses in my memory: Aaron Trammell, Cynthia Wang, Flemming Schneider, Josh Clark, Nikita Hamilton, and Ritesh Mehta. In ways subtle and profound, each of you has contributed to the possibility of this book. Please stay well, and may we meet again in better times.

Passionate Work traveled across the Pacific halfway through my writing and benefited enormously from friends and colleagues at the National University of Singapore (NUS). I couldn't have asked for a better mentor than Audrey Yue, who provided wise counsel on so many different aspects of this book. I am also grateful to Irving Goh, whose sharp observations refined my ideas, provided new leads, and kept me feeling excited about my project. Colleagues in the past and present have also provided support in navigating a new academic environment: Alex Mitchell, Elmie Nekmat, Iccha Basnyat, Jack Qiu, Lonce Wyse, Raka Shome, Shaohai Jiang, and Taberez Neyazi. The graduate students of my department, Communications and New Media, and the Cultural Studies in Asia program also provided feedback on my drafts. I would like to specially mention my research assistants, Aloysius Raja Sekar, Changwen Chen, Rashmi Mehta, and Sarah Lim, who helped with different parts of the editing process. Thanks also to Wong Shu Yun for the initial round of copy edits. It is my great fortune to have met all of you.

I would like to also give special thanks to Courtney Berger, my editor at Duke University Press, for seeing the potential in my book and approaching it with infectious enthusiasm and encouragement. Thanks also to Sandra Korn for facilitating the publication process. The three anonymous reviewers were amazing in the ways that they encouraged and pushed my ideas. Their feedback has had immeasurable impact on the final drafts.

This book would also have been impossible without the fellowship and funds provided by USC and NUS. I was fortunate to be awarded grants from Annenberg that went toward the fieldwork for the chapter on co-working spaces. Much of the revisions later drew from grants that were generously provided by NUS, which also provided me time to refine my work. I would like to specially thank Corlizz Ang, who fielded my incessant queries with patience. Thanks also to Elmie for covering me during my absence at NUS.

I cannot thank my family enough for all that they have generously offered during the period I was writing this book—a total of seven years, all included. My parents, Ang Beng Chin and Ng Swee Lai, expressed unwavering support for my decisions throughout my life; without both of you, it would have been impossible to even contemplate taking on a book project like this. My three daughters were born during the time when I writing the book, and Jilly and Jolly Koh were always ready to help me care for them, so that I could dedicate myself to writing. Thanks to everyone for braving the phobias and inconveniences of a nearly twenty-four-hour flight. I love you all. And to my brother and buddies, Zhiyi, Kelvin, and Jia Jie: this book is inspired by the many different accounts of your experiences.

To Ariel, Esther, and Kayla: Thank you for bringing so much joy into my life. I cannot be more proud to be a father of three girls. This book is also written for you.

Finally, to Jinny Koh, my best friend and spouse: words cannot express my gratitude. I see you there supporting me in everything that I've been through, and I want to do the same for you. This book is dedicated to you.
