

WRITING A BOOK in the twenty-first century is an increasingly delusional enterprise, and I have many people to thank for their help and advice as this symptom slowly cohered. First, my thanks to the many audiences who listened to presentations of this material over the past few years and offered feedback, as well as those who invited me to speak at their seminars, exhibitions, and events. In France, my thanks to Phillippe Baudouin, Jeff Guess, Pascal Rousseau, and Gwenola Wagon. In Germany, my thanks to Dagmar Brunow, Ole Frahm, Andreas Stuhlmann, and Babette Tischleder. Thanks also to Kass Banning, Brian Price, and Megan Sutherland at the University of Toronto; Jan Olsson at Stockholm University; and Nick Marx at Colorado State University. Earlier versions of this material appeared as “Ego and Ether: The Pulp Physics of Psychoanalysis,” in Broadcasting Modernism, ed. Michael Coyle, Debra Rae Cohen, and Jane A. Lewty (2009), and as “On the Origins of the Origins of the Influencing Machine,” in Media Archeology, ed. Erkki Huhtamo and Jussi Parikka (2011). A more ludic engagement of these issues appeared as “The Ghostularity,” in Communication + 1, ed. Bernard Geoghegan (2015). My thanks to all of these editors for the opportunity to rehearse this material. The cover art, by Richard Powers, is courtesy of John Davis, Kim Saxson, and the Powers Estate, and I thank them for the opportunity to share this extraordinary and as yet unpublished painting. I thank Dan Bashara, Eric Patrick, and Jocelyn Szczepaniak-Gillece for helping maintain some semblance of workplace sanity while finishing this project. Kate Choplin at the Indianapolis Public Library was kind enough to photograph a missing page of an important primary document. Finally, and most importantly, I thank Lynn Spigel for her advice, encouragement, and patience as the project proceeded, especially as there was good reason to suspect it would never be finished. It is to her that I dedicate this book.
